For a dry country

Tis easy to see,

There's much malaria
In Waterbury.

Charles Gilpatrick, the ossified man, has been sued for breach of promise. Ossified men ought to be hard-hearted.

One report says that the "regulars" nearly tore the handles off the doors of certain places in Montpelier Monday morning before they realized the changed regime. That is one of the "dry" bits of humor that characterize that city just at present.

"I never did go to school with a colored man and I never will," was the impassioned speech of a student in Eastman College in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and 159 other students stamped their feet and clapped their hands in unqualified approval. Meanwhile the alleged "colored man" tried to absolve himself from blame by saying that he is a Porto Rican. Verily the prejudices of the parents are transmitted to the children in full measure, with some running over.

THINKING IN AN EMERGENCY.

To be able to think at all during an emergency is a valuable qualification. To be able to carry out that thought to a logical conclusion is more valuable. There are many, many people who, in the calm, untroubled moments, are capable of sane, collected reasoning, but put them in a position where the distraction of external events upon them and they lose grasp of themselves, or, as it is commonly called, "lose their heads." In marked contrast are the persons whose reasoning powers do not lose their balance when the emergency arises. They carry themselves as firmly poised in danger and excitement as they would in the commonplace occurrences. It may be a matter of temperament or it may be the result of stringent schooling. In any event the power is one of the most useful that a man can have, for he may at any moment be placed in position to require the exercise of the ability, and there may be dependent upon him the lives of scores or hundreds, it may be, thousands of fellow-men. The slightest slip might be a fatal one. A Burlington priest found himself in such a position Sunday night. He had charge of services in a church edifice where a large congregation was gathered. Information came to him and to him alone that the building was on fire. There really was no danger from the fire itself so far as human life was in jeopardy. But there was every possibility of panic, should he, by word, expression, or action, betray the emotion which undoubtedly swept over him at the receipt of the information. He did not give a sign that would betray. And with only a moment's hesitation, during which his mind rapidly canvassed the courses to pursue, being mindful of the possibility of panic, he stopped the service and informed the large audience that owing to an accident the service would be suspended. Not the least alarmed, although wondering, the men, women and children fled out of the church. As soon as they had reached the outside they became aware of the trouble, but of course the danger was over then. A false move, perhaps, or the betrayal of unusual agitation, and most certainly the cry of fire, would have caused a panic, the results of which are terrible to think about. But the reasoning ability of the priest, we call it presence of mind, did not forsake him at the crucial moment. Men have been placed in more trying circumstances, perhaps, but the instance is a good illustration of the value of the ability to reason to a logical conclusion. It seems to be characteristic quite common with public speakers, and undoubtedly comes through schooling rather than from natural gift.

Hall Reed's "Rancho."

The Clara Turner company have a special scenic production of this great Southern romance, written by America's foremost playwright. The character assumed by Miss Turner is one of the best she has ever played. The drama is a pathetic story, filled with heart interest, comedy and tears.
